

Shelter, Whitewater State Park, Minnesota

This shelter building has features that differentiate it from the cast-in-one-mould-and-too-often-repeated shelter types. The continuation of the floor to give a stone paved walkway around the building is a novelty that would seem to offer the advantage of projecting the shelter's use into the immediate environs. The style of the roof shingling gives interest. The effect of the masonry is a happy mean between refinement and rusticity.
